

I was a youngster when I saw it, yet the scene is one I'm not likely ever to forget. An all-star dramatic cast had been assembled to present the venerable classic The Two Orphans. (Years later - in case you are interested - David Wark Griffith filmed that play under the title, Orphans of the Storm.) From her retirement the famous actress, Clara Morris, had been coaxed to play the part of the abbess, a smart role with only one big scene. It was that scene that I still remember. All through the play the audience had been torn and harried by the sad adventures of the two little maids lost in Paris. Now, in the swift unwinding of melodrama, their fate hung on one simple fact: Would the abbess tell a lie for their sakes? If she told the lie, they were saved. If she did not tell the lie they were lost - or so the exigencies of the plot made it seem.
