

This episode is a continuation of the education process of the first Witches by Goddess and God. The two Deities introduce the concepts of Religion, Civilization and organization to both the new Witches and the surrounding tribes of the area. As the Witches progress, they discover many of the basic healing properties of the various plants which are found in the locality and institute a rudimentary system of caring for the sick, injured, and the elderly people of the tribes. The Tribes learn the benefits of cooperation, alliances and mutual assistance, and more importantly, learn that personal honor and duty effects how one is viewed among others in the World around them. Most importantly, they all learn that the Gods neither demand nor want for the people to worship them but rather, simply seek to establish a relationship that is built upon mutual love and respect. The Gods make it very clear that they will love and bless the people, whether the Gods are loved in return or not, just as parents love their children whether that love is returned or not. The Gods stress the importance of unconditional love, love that is freely given without any expectation or return. The Gods and the Witches also display characteristics of self-sacrifice for the greater good of all. The Witches also discover the advantages of diplomacy over outright warfare in a compelling scenario with a belligerent tribe which they have already encountered in the recent past. The Wheel of the year reaches its inevitable conclusion in a very surprising ending and completes the story part of this trilogy, along with the revelation of the actual setting for this story.
